Psychology is the study of behavior from cognitive, social, clinical, and biological perspectives. Among other things, psychologists study the most effective ways to deal with others, how humans can best adapt to change, stress, and a variety of other situations that are a part of daily living. Major subfields within the discipline include human cognition, emotion, behavior, social interactions, and mind/brain relationships. In addition, upper division courses explore behavioral genetics, cognitive neuroscience, cognitive psychology, clinical psychology, child development, women's health, and judgment and decision making.

The Psychology department at the University of Colorado Boulder regards the science of psychology and neuroscience as ideal platforms to enhance students' critical thinking, creativity, complex reasoning, research skills, and effectiveness in written and oral communication.

The undergraduate Bachelor of Arts degree in Psychology provides an excellent background for positions in administration, recreation, health education, personnel work, labor relations, advertising, public relations, vocational rehabilitation, research, further professional studies, and much more.
